

The Sky Park Project

Being a small island nation, land is of a premium. Natural forest reserves and park lands will always be limited. The temptation to encroach and build into them increases as the population rises. Yet parks and open spaces are essential to maintaining quality of life and as such we are always finding new and innovative ways to make our lives more free.

The Sky Park project was inspired by the idea of creating high rise parks and garden spaces that would service high rise living. Emerging from the cities Central Park a series of elevated platforms would connect one high rise building to another along the bay front. It was an ambitious project which required cooperation and a joint investment from all the high rise waterfront buildings along the cities South-Eastern edge. It is a feat of engineering that has become a must visit for tourists from around the world..

The Sky Park takes around one full day to walk from one end to the other. Along the journey are a plethora of restaurants and eateries. Further to this are small shops, adventure gardens, sporting facilities and plenty of playgrounds including fun things for young children. Further to this are the breathtaking views around the city and out to the sea.
